

Since the FCC has shown it is so concerned with indecency on the airwaves of late, it is vital that the matter of media giants using the public trust to advance private agendas be exposed. In the case of Sinclair Broadcasting's expressed intention of airing a blatantly partisan program like 'Stolen Honor', just days before a national election, concepts like "fairness" and "balance" clearly have little or no importance.

This is an obvious violation of the law requiring broadcasters using the public airwaves to serve the public interest. It is up to the FCC to enforce that law and to let Sinclair know there will be serious consequences should they pursue this reckless course. I find it appalling that a company would even consider such behavior, and even worse that they feel free to do so without fear of the FCC. That, to me, is really indecent.
